Byron Browne via Getty Images Along with other states who already have in place measures allowing them to punish illegal immigration with jail time, Arizona could follow the lead of several other states to give Arizona police officers the right to ask for proof of citizenship during traffic stops and encounters. [...] According to police, they are now trained to inform suspects that they have the right to refuse to answer questions about immigration status during the course of a lawful traffic stop. [Source] In April, Arizona's Senate Bill 1070 was held up in the U.S. Supreme Court, over whether or not state police could continue to make warrants for the arrest of people who were suspected of being in the country illegally. The court ultimately decided that the state's Immigration and Customs Enforcement task force could continue to issue the warrants. SB 1070 had become a polarizing issue in the state because of the racism directed at Latino immigrants from some sectors of its population. But a bipartisan compromise passed this summer curtailed some of the most controversial provisions of the law, including one that would have allowed state police to inquire about immigration status while performing traffic stops. [...] Arizona has the second-most police officers per capita of any state in the country. Gorton says SB 1070 gives police new methods to check suspects for immigration status, though it does not allow them to take action against those suspected of being in the country illegally. [Source] The ACLU of Arizona is suing over SB 1070, arguing that it subjects racial minorities to harassment and discourages them from visiting court. Others are seeking to have the law struck down as unconstitutional or rolled back. When the measure cleared the Legislature last month, it created a scheme for state and local law enforcement officers to enforce federal immigration laws. Not long after, immigrant rights activists raised concerns that it invited racial profiling and that its controversial provisions would lead to more arrests of minorities and result in more deportations.
